FOREWORD

Until quite recent times, almost every young student in India maintained a Commonplace Book—a Subhashita-sangraha, if he read Sanskrit, or a Beyaz, if he was interested in Persian. Whenever, in course of his reading or in conversation with his elders, he came across a verse that caught his fancy, he said to himself, like Hamlet, "Meet it is I set it down", and he wrote it in his book and remembered it and used it not only as an elegant appendage to conversation or writing, but also as a part of education to instruct, inspire and elevate him. Thousands of such collections must still be in existence, containing well-known current verses of course, but also a large number whose authors are obscure or unknown. When the enterprising student grew up and literary ambitions stirred within him, he began composing verses himself,

> "Cheer'd up himself with ends of verse,
> And sayings of philosophers".

Some collections of verse and of fables were specially made for the education and edification of princes. Now and then, statesmen and ministers of state utilised the talents of poets to draw princes away from pleasure to a realisation of their public duties. Thus, it is said, that the Hindi poet, Bihari, wrote his famous Doha beginning नहिं पराग नहिं मधुर रस to point a moral.

There are many collections with which scholars are familiar. The Sharngadhara Paddhati, the three Shatakas of Bhartrihari, the Aryasaptashati of Govardhana, are amongst the best known. One interesting anthology, the Vidyakara-sahasrakam was published a few years ago by the Allahabad University of which I was then Vice-Chancellor.

My favourite in this type of work, is Jagannatha's Bhamini-vilasa. His boast is thoroughly justified.

माधुर्य-परमसीमा सारस्वत-जलधि-मथन-सम्भूता ।
पिबतामनल्प सुखदा वसुधायां मम सुधा-कविता ॥

He has divided his anthology into four parts. The verses in each are little gems. Not only are they richly adorned with literary grace; they are packed with thought, and many of them are characterised with intensive feeling.

The poems in these collections belong to what the Sanskrit writers on poetics describe as the species "Muktaka" or what the ancient Europeans called "Gnomic—poetry". There are many examples of Gnomes in Greek poetry—some solemn and serious, others full of mirth. Writing in the sixteenth century, Henry Peacham defined a gnome as "a saying pertaining to the manners and common practices of men, which declareth with an apt brevity, what in this our life ought to be done, or not done".

Harihara's "Suktimuktavali" is an admirable specimen of this kind of poetry. It is divided into twelve chapters. The first deals with gods and goddesses; the second is concerned with children and their upbringing; the third contains words of advice to the young; the fourth is devoted to stay abroad; the fifth has verses calculated to win the patron's favour; the sixth has for its theme the manner in which royalty should be treated; politics are the subject matter of the seventh chapter; the eighth contains a description of. the six seasons; the ninth concerns itself with erotics; in the tenth is an account of the different types of heroes and heroines; the eleventh is a miscellany; and the last chapter sees the grown up man back home, intent on leading a life of contemplation,—"calm of mind, all passion spent".

The book has been edited with meticulous care by Pandit Ramanatha Jha. The elaborate introduction contains valuable materials the collection of which must have meant much industry and research. The editor has thrown light on the ancestry and date of Harihara; he has analysed the anthology in order to show how the social and intellectual life of the age is revealed in it. It is remarkable contribution to our knowledge of Mithila.

INTRODUCTION

The work presented here was first published in 1890 as the 86th volume of the Kavyamala series; a second edition was issued in 1910. But the text, as published, is far from being perfect. In many places the reading is corrupt and therefore, obscure; at places the verses are mutilated; and above all, there are many verses missing in the printed text, the most important of which are the concluding two verses which form the Kaviprashasti of the work. There is no introductory matter, and it is not possible to say anything either about the source on which that edition was based or about the author of the book. It appears that the Kavyamala edition was published from a single manuscript and that an imperfect one.

The absence of the two concluding verses, in which the poet has furnished us with his personal history, detracts greatly from the value of the Kavyamala edition and it is no wonder that ignorance still prevails about the author although his work was published more than half a century ago. Aufrecht in his Catalogus Catalogarum does not say anything about him though he has recorded a Subhashita as the work of a Harihara. In his History of Classical Sanskrit Literature, Mr. M. Krishnamachariar has not a word to say either about this work or about the author. In a recent issue of the Kalyana, the well-known Hindi monthly of Gorakhpur (volume XVIII, part VII, page 934 for May, 1944) it has been claimed that Harihara, the author of Bhartrihari-nirvedanataka as well as of this Subhashita was a resident of the Deccan. And what is surprising, even so well informed a scholar as Mm. Dr. Umesha Mishra states in the introduction to his edition of the Vidyakarasahasrakam (published in 1943 as the second volume of the Allahabad University Sanskrit series) that the Subhashitavali of Harihara is still unpublished.

I was led to undertake an edition of this work by the clear statement of the Mahamahopadhyaya and it was only when my work was far advanced that I chanced to see the printed text of this book in the Kavyamala series. On comparing it, however, with the manuscripts available to me, I was convinced that there was still need for a critical edition based on the best and most reliable manuscripts. It might be of value to lovers of Sanskrit language and literature; and a full and authentic account of the author and his time would dispel all doubts about his identity and age. This is my justification for bringing out a new edition of this exquisite work. I hope that by its publication, new light will be thrown on the social history of Mithila of the 16th century and on the ideals of the age.

This edition has been based on the following four manuscripts besides the printed text of the Kavyamalu series.

The first of them, on which it has been mainly based, called by me मा hereafter, was in the possession of Pandita Madhava Jha of Ujan (Darbhanga) but has since been acquired for the Darbhanga Raj Library. It is on palm-leaves, 49 in number, 14 inches long by 1¾ inches broad, with five lines on each page and about 55 letters in a line. Except for the ink which is not sparkling, the manuscript is in an excellent condition. It is complete but as many as 21 verses including the last two ones are found added in the margin by some other scribe and they are not quite legible, partly because of the fading ink and partly because of the damage to the ends of the leaves. The post-colophon remark shows that the transcription of this manuscript was completed by one Abhirama, a Karana (Kayastha) by caste, in the village of Mahisari on Wednesday, the 12th day of the dark half of Ashvina in the year 544 of the Lakshmana Sen Era prevalent in Mithila which corresponds to the Saka year 1575 equivalent to 1653 A.D. The text of this manuscript is not quite correct; it abounds in errors mostly visual and transcriptional; and though it has been revised at least twice and many errors have been corrected, still there are many mistakes which, to that extent, mar its value and reliability.

The second codex which, too, has been in the Darbhanga Raj Library, and will be called by me ख hereafter, is on palm-leaves, 57 in number, of which 6 leaves numbering 39 to 44, are missing and some 6 others are broken. The leaves are 12 inches by 1¼ inches with four or five lines on each page and about 70 letters in a line. Except for the missing leaves, the manuscript is complete and all the verses, even those that are added in the margin in the first manuscript, are found here in the body of the text. It is written very legibly in very bright ink but is in a very dilapidated condition, rotten and thoroughly worm-eaten, with innumerable holes in each leaf, so much so that many letters are completely eaten up. Like the first, this too abounds in mistakes, though not so numerous, of the same visual and transcriptional kind and this too has been revised as a result of which some of these errors stand corrected. The post-colophon remark shows this to have been copied by one Krishnadasa, a Karana (Kayastha) by caste, in the village of Digaondha on Sunday, the 3rd day of the dark half of Chaitra in the year 556 of the Lakshmana Sen Era, i.e., only twelve years after the first. It may be interesting to note here that on palm-leaves of the same size and in the handwriting of the same scribe, there is, in the Darbhanga Raj Library, a manuscript equally rotten and worm-eaten of Bhartriharinirvedanataka, another famous work of the same author, Harihara.

The third copy, called by me ग, is an incomplete paper manuscript belonging to the late Pandita Padmanatha Jha of Ujan and contains only 14 folios, 12 inches by 4 inches, with 11 or 12 lines on each page and about 66 letters in a line. It breaks off after the 30th verse of the 9th chapter. It is not, therefore, possible to say when it was copied but it appears to be about 200 years old. It is written fairly legibly though not quite correctly and from the nature of errors it is quite clear that the scribe did not understand all that he was copying. Nevertheless, the manuscript has been of great help to me in solving many puzzles that have been created by the two palm-leaf manuscripts.

The last one, called by me ग, is only a fragment and contains only five folios from No. 27 to 31 beginning from the 61st verse of the 8th chapter up to the 8th of the 10th. It belongs to Babu Ganesha Jha of Ujan and is written very legibly in a bold and clear hand fairly correctly, most probably by a Pandita. These five folios were found by me in a bundle of old papers and in spite of my best efforts no sixth could be found.

It will thus appear that the bulk of this edition, up to the 42nd verse of the 9th chapter after which the codex रा misses six leaves, has been prepared from three manuscripts मा, रा and प or ग; 31 verses from the 61st of the 8th chapter to the 30th of the 9th from four manuscripts मा, रा, प and ग; 17 verses from the 42nd of the 9th chapter up to the 8th of the 10th, and the last two chapters from two manuscripts मा and ग or रा; thus there are only 48 verses of the 10th chapter after the 8th verse that have been based on a single manuscript, namely the first one.

And then, there has been the printed text of the Kavyamala series which, though imperfect and full of blemishes, still preserves the genuine readings in many cases where all other manuscripts have erred. This has been fully utilised by me and has been of very great help to me in arriving at the correct readings and deciding many disputed ones.

In choosing the readings for the text of this edition I have not confined myself rigidly to any one of the different readings presented by these codices but have adopted what appeared to me to be correct and most appropriate. All the different readings, nevertheless, have been given by me in the foot-notes with the siglum of each codex after them so that this edition will be found to contain the readings of all the texts available to me including those of the Kavyamala edition with the notation का after them. The reader will have thus all the different readings before him and will be free to choose the best for himself if the one adopted by me does not appeal to him.

A comparison of the texts of the different codices reveals certain affinities among them. The two palm-leaf manuscripts, for example, copied almost in the same decade, within 12 years of each other, by Karana Kayasthas, who have been the professional scribes of manuscripts in Mithila, are wonderfully alike not only in their readings but also in their mistakes. It would have been, therefore, reasonable to suppose that both of them were transcribed from the same archetype; but the fact that one of them has as many, as 21 verses added to it later on in the margin while the other has all of them in the body of the text, seems to preclude such supposition. As they are, it appears that one of them was originally transcribed from an imperfect copy with its text still fluid, whereas the other was transcribed from a copy the text of which was finally fixed. The sameness of the mistakes (specially where the meaning of the text is not quite easy to grasp) remains, nevertheless, a mystery and howsoever much we may attribute them to the carelessness and ignorance of the scribes, still the fact that both of them should fall into exactly the same mistakes cannot thus be explained away.

The codex प contains all the verses, as far as it goes, in the very body of the text without any late addition, but from the abundance of errors it is obvious that it was copied more carelessly by a still more ignorant scribe. The errors here are not, however, exactly the same as in the two palm-leaf manuscripts. It contains some variant readings also which in some cases tally with those of the Kavyamala edition. It appears, therefore, that this is a careless copy of a copy that was itself a careless transcription from some original and follows perhaps a different tradition.

The last codex ग is too small a fragment to form the basis of any generalisation though it contains the most correct readings in most cases. It misses, however, one verse that is missing from the Kavyamala edition also, the 50th verse of the 9th chapter, which is added later on in the margin in the codex मा.

The Kavyamala edition, as has been noticed already, misses as many as 28 verses but in only 4 out of the 12 chapters into which the book is divided. They are verses Nos. 10, 15, 24, 25, 35, and 36 of the 5th chapter; Nos. 23, 24, 40 and 50 of the 9th chapter; Nos. 8, 21, 22, 25, 28, 32, 33, 36, 48, 51, 57, 58 and 78 of the 11th chapter; and Nos. 22, 30, 69, 76 and 77 (the last two being the Kaviprashasti at the end) of the 12th chapter. Except eight out of these 28 verses, namely Nos. 23, 24 and 40 of the 9th chapter and Nos. 21, 51, 57, 58 and 78 of the 11th, all the other twenty verses are added in the margin in the codex मा. There is only one verse, No. 27, of the 5th chapter, which is found in the margin in the codex मा but is also present in the Kavyamala edition. Thus in the printed text, there are 627 verses in all while in the codex मा or रा the number of verses is 655.

It is interesting to note here that on page 164 of the 5th Volume of his famous Notices, R. L. Mitra describes a manuscript of this work, Manuscript No. 1851. From the last line given there which is the second half of the concluding verse, it is clear that it contains the Kaviprashasti but the extent of this codex is given there to be only 629 verses. Leaving aside the Kaviprashasti, the number of verses in this codex also is the same as in the Kavyamala edition. It appears that this codex also follows the version of the Kavyamala to which perhaps the Kaviprashasti was added later on but the other additions were not.

In the Kaviprashasti at the end, Harihara states that it took him long to complete the work: चिरेण चीर्णा are his exact words. It is not unreasonable, therefore, to suppose that the text of this work was fluid for a long time and even when the text of the other eight chapters was finally fixed, these four chapters, namely the 5th, the 9th, the 11th and the 12th continued growing, receiving additions every now and then.

I can almost visualise the author sending his autograph copy, imperfect though he might call it, into circulation among his admiring friends and pupils, and then at times making additions to it whenever a new idea struck him, jotting them down in the margin of his copy. I can, likewise, picture some among those admirers, charmed by its excellence wishing eagerly to have a copy of it, imperfect though it might be, and in their eagerness employing a speedily copying scribe to transcribe it quickly. Such hurried transcriptions of the imperfect version might be the original of the Kavayamala edition, the exemplar of the manuscript noticed by R. L. Mitra and the original form of the codex मा, the last one revised and completed later from a perfect copy, probably from the autograph copy itself, the second one receiving only the Kaviprashasti at some later date because it described the author, and the first one remaining as imperfect as it was originally taken down.

On the evidence of all these differing versions, three stages of the text of this work can very well be presumed. The earliest one was the text reproduced in the Kavyamala edition which is evidently the shortest and wanting even in the Kaviprashasti. The second stage is preserved in the original version of the codex मा where we have eight more verses but as many as twenty verses including the Kaviprashasti are still wanting. And finally we have the text of the codex जा and probably of प also, as far as it is available, where the text seems to have been finally fixed. The 50th verse of the 9th chapter seems to have been the latest addition made by the author, added perhaps after the exemplar of the codex जा was transcribed, very possibly even after the Kaviprashasti was inserted in the text. Viewed in this light it would appear that the codex मा was transcribed from the autograph copy of the work while the author was still alive and was completed later on, possibly after the passing away of the author, by adding the new verses in the margin as in the autograph copy, and that the codex जा was transcribed twelve years later from the same autograph copy after the author had passed away, taking down all the verses in their proper order as finally fixed by him. This explains the similarity between the two palm-leaf Mss. which, copied within 12 years of each other, are so very much alike not only in their readings but also in their mistakes. This finds support from the fact that at a later date not only this Subhashita but also another work of the same author, Bhartriharinirvedanataka, was transcribed by the same Karana Krishnadasa. If this be the fact, the date of the passing away of the author would be some time after the transcription of the codex भा but before that of the codex रा, i.e., between the years 1653 and 1665 A. D. This is exactly the age in which the author flourished which, as I shall show later, can be deduced from the details of his birth and family connections.

THE AUTHOR.

It appears from the Kaviprashasti that this work was designated Sukti-muktavali by the author, but it is known as Hariharasubhashita. It is by this name that it has been called at the end of each chapter and in the final colophon, not only in the printed edition of the Kavyamala series where the Kaviprashasti is missing, but in other Mss. also which do contain the Kaviprashasti. The title is obviously after the author's name and on the basis of the title alone this has been called the work of Harihara in the Kavyamala edition which, without Kaviprashasti as it is, does not contain any mention of the author's name. There is, thus, no doubt about the fact that Harihara was the author of this Subhashita.

But Harihara is a very common name and there are as many as 24 Hariharas, (whose works are known to exist) mentioned by Aufrecht. Our author, however, calls himself a son of Lakshmi and Raghava in the 74th verse of the 12th chapter (71st in the Kavyamala edition) and then he proceeds with fuller details about himself and his family in the Kaviprashasti at the end. It is interesting to note here that both the verses of this Kaviprashasti are found, but with slight variations to suit the context, in the prologue of Prabhavatiparinayanataka, another work of the same author. They are, thus, very valuable from the point of view of the author's personal history. Full of similes and containing a pun, they may be translated in simple English:--

"Like the sun rising from the mountain in the East, the pious twice-born Raghava, taking birth from Hrishikesha. shone in the great family of Divakara. Lakshmi was born to a Maithila with his soul pure with learning. From them two were born, two sons as renowned in their family as Kusha and Lava.

By the elder of the two, Harihara, "this garland of the pearls of good sayings", Sukti-muktavali, full of all novel excellences, was prepared after a long time, for the sake of his younger brother, Shri Nilakantha (who is) the ornament of the neck of the poets."

It follows from this that Harihara and his younger brother Nilakantha were the sons of Raghava and Lakshmi; Raghava was the son of Hrishikesha, of the respectable family of Divakara, and Lakshmi was the daughter of a renowned Maithila scholar. But Raghava, it is well known, was the name of Rama of the celebrated solar dynasty, the dynasty of Divakara, and he had two sons, Kusha and Lava, from a Maithila wife, Sita. Working, therefore, upon this double signification of the term "Raghava", the poet has, in this verse, drawn out the simile suggestive of a comparison of his own family with the famous family of the Suryavamsis. his father compared with Rama, his mother with Janaki and himself and his brother with Kusha and Lava. To suggest even by implication a comparison between his father and Rama who is regarded by all Hindus as an incarnation of God, was, to say the least of it, a great presumption on his part unless, of course, his father was noted for his piety. Anyway, this comparison clearly brings out before us the greatness of the family to which he belonged and the respect with which his father along with himself and his brother were looked upon.

Lest the statement that his mother was the daughter of a Maithila scholar should imply that his father was a non-Maithila like Rama, the poet uses a pun on the term दिवाकर महावंशे in the second line of the first verse. Take away 'दिवा" from this compound and construe it with the first part of the sentence and the whole sentence would mean—"As the sun rising from the mountain in the East shines during day, the pious twice-born Raghava, having taken his birth from Hrishikesha, shone in the family of the Karamahas. This family of the Karamahas is, indeed, one of the highest among the Maithila Brahmanas, and by means of this pun it is intended by the author to convey that he belonged to that family. This is the meaning read into these two verses both by Mm. Mukund Jha Baksi (in the introduction to his edition of Bhartriharinirvedanataka) and by Kavishekhara Badari Natha Jha (in his paper on Maithila Panditas of Yore in the Mithilanka of the Mithila-Mihira of Darbhanga). From all this it follows that our author, Harihara, was a Maithila, born in one of the highest and most respectable families of the Maithila Brahmanas. Indeed, in face of the clear statement of the author in two of his works, Subhashita and the Prabhavatiparinayanataka in exactly the same words, it is impossible to hold otherwise.

This is, moreover, supported by the Panjis. The Panjis are the consolidated genealogies of all the important families of Maithila Brahmanas collected by Maharaja Harisinhadeva, the last of the Karnata kings of Mithila, in the Saka Year 1248, with a view to ensuring that no Maithila Brahmana may marry within the prohibited degrees of relationship. Since then Panjis have grown into an institution, kept and maintained up-to-date by a class of Panditas called Panjikaras, who have to certify before a marriage is finally settled that the parties are not prohibited by relationship to marry. These Panjis not only corroborate in every detail what Harihara tells us about his family and parentage but they furnish us also with fresh facts about the history of the family and its connections which reveal the high standing of the family, and on the basis of which it becomes easy to determine, within short limits, the age in which the author must have flourished.

When the Panjis were first promulgated in the Saka Year 1248, there was one Gangeshvara in the family of the Karamahas. He was one of the thirteen who were declared, by reason of their pure lineage, learning and exemplary character, the highest among the Maithila Brahmanas, known thenceforth as Shrotriyas, by which name their descendants are still called, provided they have not degenerated by marrying too low and thus lost their position. This Gangeshvara had seven sons and as a result perhaps of the new social order brought into being by the promulgation of the Panjis which classified all Maithila Brahmanas into three grades according to their birth, accomplishments, and character, all the seven sons of Gongeshvara migrated to different parts of the country and settled down in different villages, giving rise thereby to different branches of the parent family, each denoted by adding the name of the village newly adopted to the name of the parent family, Karamaha. One of the sons of Gangeshvara was Shrivatsa and he settled down in the village of Behat, still a flourishing village in which the Railway Station Jhanjharpur on the Oudh Tirhut Railway is situated, some 25 miles east of Darbhanga. Though the main branch of his descendants has, in course of time, migrated some five miles westward to the village Bittho, they are still known as belonging to the family of "Karamaha Behat".

*[In all these charts the sign of equality stands for "Married to"]

One of the sons of Shrivatsa is popularly called "Bachhe" but in one of the old Panji Mss. (in the possession of Panmikara Modananda Jha of Shivanagara in the district of Purnea) his name is said to have been "DIVAKARA," called Bachhe. It is this Divakara in whose high family Raghava, his great-grandson, is described as shining by our author, Harihara ? Divakara, called Bachhe, was married to the daughter of Lakhu Thakur of the Khandavala family. This Lakhu was the younger brother of Shripati, called Dube Thakur one of whose sons Harapati was married to the daughter of Maharaja Dhira Singha Hridayanarayana of Mithila (1400—1460) and another Chandrapati, called Chana Thakur was the father of Mm. Maharaja Mahesha Thakur (1510—1580), the founder of the present Darbhanga Raj.

Bachhe had two sons, Manu and Bhabe. Of them the younger, Bhabe, was married to the daughter of the renowned scholar and author, Mahamahopadhyaya San-Mishra Shankara (1385—1450) of the family of Sodarapur, resident of Sarisab, while the elder, Manu, was the father of Hrishikesha, popularly known as Harakhu. This Hrishikesha had three wives; by his first wife he had a son, Raghava, and a daughter who was married to Harikesha of the Sodarpura family resident of Dhaoli, who was the grandson of Sondal, whose sister was married to Maharaja Shiva Singha Rupanarayana (1352—1407) immortalised by Vidyapati in his songs.

Raghava bears the title of "Sadu" (सद्दु) in the Panjis which is an abbreviated form of "Sadupadhyaya". Like its cognate forms Sanmishra or Satthakkura this is a compound formed by joining "Sad" सद्) meaning "the good" to the ordinary family title. Thus there is Sadupadhyaya for those who are Upadhayas, Sanmishra for the Mishras, Satthakkur for the Thakurs. It follows, therefore, that the ordinary title of the family was Upadhyaya of which the modern form is "JHA", and that though Raghava Jha was not a renowned scholar to merit the coveted title of Mahamahopadhyaya or even a Mahopadhyaya, he was widely respected in his days for his character, abilities and piety. As a mark of respect he was called Raghava Jha, the good, which is denoted in the Panjis by this title "Sadu' (सद्दु).

Raghava Jha, the good, had two wives. By the first wife, who was the daughter of Madhusudana popularly called Madhu Jha of the Sadarpur Kanhouli family, he had four sons, Babu, Banai, Birai and Babi and two daughters, Devasena and Kumari. Devasena, perhaps the eldest of all, was married to Mm. Aniruddha Jha of Mandara Sihauli family. There is a verse attributed to him in the Vidyakarasahasrakam (No. 799) which shows him to have been a contemporary of Raja Mana Singh, the famous courtier of Emperor Akbar; while there are two verses (Nos. 110-111) in the Kavindra-Chandrodaya which prove that during the reign of the Emperor Shahjehan he was at Banaras, most probably in his old age, living there a retired life. One of his sons was Mahamahopadhyaya Mohana, author of Anyoktishataka described by R. L. Mitra on page 38 of the 6th volume of his famous Notices. The second daughter of Raghava Jha, named Kumari, was married to Purushottama Jha of Naraon Sulhani family, two of whose sons Sadupadhyaya Harinandan and Raghunandan were married to the daughters of Maharaja Shubhankara Thakur (1571—1620), the youngest son of Mm. Maharaja Mahesha Thakur. This Purushottam Jha, it may be noted here, was married previously to the daughter of Agnihotrika Vishvambhara Thakur, son of Mm. Damodar Thakur, who was the elder brother of Mm. Maharaja Mahesha Thakur. To the daughter of Babu Jha, the eldest son of Raghava Jha, was married Maharaja Purushottama Thakur (1595—1641) the eldest son of Maharaja Shubhankar Thakur.

The descendants of Raghava Jha, the good, in direct male line are still flourishing and they are all descended from his second son Banai Jha, through his son Jayakrishna who was a poet of repute. Jayakrishna had an only son Sadupadhyaya Jagannatha whose eldest daughter was married to Maharaja Raghava Simha (1680—1739) on whose death she became रानी at the age of 14 only and the youngest to Satthakkura Ekanatha whose son Maharaja Madhava Singha ascended the throne of Mithila in 1785 from whom the present Maharajadhiraja of Darbhanga is sixth in descent. The descendants of this Jagannatha Jha are still flourishing and they all inhabit the village of Bittho. It may be interesting to note here that they have maintained up to the present times the leadership of the Shrotriya community of the Maithila Brahmanas, which will be clear from the fact that the sister of the present Maharajadhiraja of Darbhanga, who is the leader of all Maithila Brahmanas and head of the Shrotriyas, is married to a scion of this family, Babu Mukund Jha, who is sixth in descent from Sadupadhyaya Jagannatha and ninth from Sadupadhyaya Raghava.

Raghava Jha, the good, married another wife, most probably after the death of the first, and she bore him two sons, Harihara and Nilakantha, and a daughter named Bahula, whose only daughter was married to Mm. Yadunatha of the Kujilabara Bhakharauli family. This Yadunatha was the grandson of Mm. Suchi (1500—1560) the teacher of Mm. Maharaja Mahesha Thakur and his maternal grand-father was the son of the great Vachaspati Mishra the famous Smriti writer of Mithila. The daughter's son of Yadunatha was Mm. Lochana, the author of Raga-tarangini, composed during the reign of Maharaja Narapati Thakur. (1650—1700). A copy of Naisadhiyacharitam transcribed by Mm. Lochana in Saka Year 1603 is still preserved in the Darbhanga Raj Library.

The second wife of Raghava Jha, the good, called, Lakshmi, was the daughter of Rameshvara of the Sodarpur Dhaoli family and is styled a Mahamahopadhyaya in the Panjis. He is the "Vidyavadatma Maithila", to whom Harihara describes his mother to have been born. To this Rameshvara, most probably, there is a reference in the 22nd verse of the 2nd chapter of this Subhashita where it is stated that inspite of all his philosophical attainments, his fame rested chiefly on his poetical compositions. Indeed, Harihara inherited scholarship, including the poetic gifts, from his mother's side.

Mm. Harihara had two wives. His first wife was named Bachhana. She was the daughter of Bhavaninatha Jha of the Sodarpur Kanhouli family—the same family in which his father, Raghava Jha, had first married. By this wife he had a son and at least one daughter who was married to Baladeva Jha of Mandara Sihauli family. This Baladeva was the son of Mahipati by the daughter of Mm. Sadananda, the son of Mm. Madhusudan Thakur, the author of the various Kantakodharas, and grandson of Vaidika Vishvambhara by the daughter of Mm. Damodara Thakur, the elder brother of Mm. Maharaja Mahesha Thakur. His only son Krishnananda, was a Naiyayika who had a son named Dharmananda, who was a poet. Dharamananda's son Rudradatta died without a child and thus after three generations, the direct male line of Harihara's descendants became extinct

The second wife of Harihara was the daughter of Bhatta Jha of the Mandara Pataluku family. The sister of this Bhatta Jha was married to a son of Mm. Bhagiratha, popularly called Megha Thakur, the eldest brother of Mm. Mahesha Thakur, and author of the celebrated commentary Jalada on the Kusumanjali of Udayanacharya. This second wife of Harihara had no issue.

Nilakantha, his brother, who is described by Harihara as Kavikantha-vibhushana or an ornament for the neck of the poets, and to whom both this Subhashita and the dreams Prabhavatiparinaya are dedicated (by which is meant that they were compiled for his sake), is styled a Jyotirvid in all the Panjis but over and above that he is called in some Panji Mss. a Mahamahopadhyaya while in others he is termed a Sadupadhyaya. It is clear, therefore, that he was not a mere astrologer but an all round scholar, highly respected for his learning and scholarship, though he had specialised in astrology and possessed poetic talents also. Two of his works, both on astrology, have been noticed in the third volume of the Descriptive Catalogue of the Manuscripts in Mithila; they are "Janmapaddhati" No. 74 and "Jatakapaddhati". No. 89. He was married to Apuchha who was the younger sister of Bachhana, Harihara's first wife. He had two sons and two daughters. One of his daughters was married to the same Baladeva to whom Harihara's daughter was married, and therefore, the marriage must have taken place after the death of his first wife, Harihara's daughter. His second daughter was married to Shripati Mishra of the Sodarapur Hati family, whose mother was the daughter of Shikhe Mishra of Hariamba Balirajpur family by the daughter of Mm. Maharaja Mahesha Thakur. The two sons of Nilakantha were Kulapati and Mm. Jyotirvid Ruchipati. Ruchipati's son Mm. Indrapati was the author of Mimamsapalvala, a manuscript of which. No. 1959, dated the Saka Year 1667 has been described by R. L. Mitra in the 5th Volume of his Notices. The son of Indrapati, also, was a Mahamahopadhyaya, Krishnapati by name, who had a son and a grandson but this grandson of Krishnapati, named Jhalahana Jha, died without a child some fifty years ago and with him therefore the direct male line of Nilakantha's descendants also became extinct after five generations.

No direct male descendants of Raghava Jha, the good, by his second wife have thus survived but as long as they lived, they all inhabited the village of Bittho, where the descendants of Raghava Jha by his first wife have always resided and are still flourishing. Raghava Jha was fifth in descent form Shrivatsa, who founded the Behat branch of the Karamaha family, where he must have been living with his sons, and though we do not know who migrated from there to Bittho and under what circumstances, it is clear that it must have been either Raghava Jha himself or some one among his three ancestors. Anyway, it is clear that our author Mm. Harihara Jha was a resident of the village of Bittho.

Such was the family history of Mm. Harihara Upadhyaya. Since the days of the Panjiprabandha, more than 600 years ago up to the present times, this family has maintained the leadership of the social hierarchy of the Maithila Brahmanas and few families can boast of such an unbroken record. I have omitted much in the foregoing account that can be gleaned from the Panjis about the position of the family and its high connections; nevertheless, I have described, I hope, sufficiently in detail, the history of the family, so that for each generation there has been shown the relationship of at least one such name that can be recognised at once without any shadow of doubt. On the basis of these synchronisms, it may not be difficult, as I have already stated, to determine within short limits the age in which Mahamahopadhyaya Harihara must have flourished.

HIS AGE.

It has been said above that in the Saka Year 1248 when the Panjis were first promulgated there was Gangeshvara in the family of the Karamahas and he was then perhaps a young man, say, of forty. Just at present his fourteenth descendant, Babu Mukund Jha, is in his full manhood. Thus, there have elapsed 14 generations in this family during these 622 years. Each generation covers, therefore, a period of about 44 years. Mm. Harihara was seventh in descent from Gangeshvara and therefore, it follows, roughly, that in the Saka year 1556. Mm. Harihara was, say, about 40 years of age. The date of his birth, thus, falls during the closing decade of the 16th century. This is the conclusion which we arrive at from a consideration of other factors also.

It has been said that a daughter of Raghava Jha, Kumari, was married to Purushottama Jha who was married previously to the daughter of Agnihotrika Vishvambhara Thakur. Raghava Jha must have been, therefore, a contemporary, though a younger one, of Vishvambhara Thakur. This Vishvambhara was the eldest son of Mm Damodara Thakur who was the elder brother of Mm. Maharaja Mahesha Thakur. Mm. Mahesh Thakur, it is almost settled, was born in about 1510 A. D. The birth of his elder brother, Damodara, can, therefore, be assigned to the year 1500 and that of his son Vishvambhara to the year 1535 or thereabout. Raghava Jha, therefore might have been born in or about 1540 A. D.

Two of the sons of Raghava Jha's daughter, Kumari, were married to the daughters of Maharaja Shubhankara Thakur who was born in 1571 A.D., ascended the throne of Mithila in 1584 A.D., and died in 1620 A.D. Maharaja Purushottama Thakur, eldest son of Maharaja Shubhankara Thakur, married the daughter of Babu Jha, the eldest son of Raghava Jha. From these synchronisms it is obvious that Raghava Jha was almost a generation older than Maharaja Shubhankara Thakur. It is not unreasonable, therefore, to suppose him about 30 years older than Maharaja Shubhankara Thakur.

But both Babu Jha and Kumari were born to the first wife of Raghava Jha by whom he had four sons and two daughters, while Harihara and his younger brother and sister were the children of his second wife. It can, therefore, be safely assumed that Raghava Jha married a second time after the death of his first wife. Supposing he married his first wife at the age of thirty and that she lived with him at least for 20 years, in course of which six children were born to her, it follows that he married the second wife, say, at the age of 50 and thus the birth of the first child to his second wife could have taken place, say about the year 1595. This is, therefore, the approximate year of Mm. Harihara's birth.

Moreover, the second daughter of Harihara's younger brother Nilakantha was married to Shripati Mishra who was the daughter's son of Shikhe Mishra. This Shikhe Mishra was twice married, both times to the daughter of Mm. Maharaja Mahesha Thakur. His first wife, Helana, was the first child of her father and after her death, Shikha Mishra married again the daughter of the same Maharaja, Manika, by name, who was a child of his old age. Supposing she was born in 1560 when the Maharaja was fifty years of age, the birth of a son to her daughter can safely be assigned to the year 1610 or thereabout, specially as this daughter was her sixth child. Nilakantha's daughter was the second wife of this Shripati and supposing Nilakantha to have been born in or about 1600, the marriage of his second daughter could well have taken place, say, in the year 1650 when Shripati was forty years of age. Anyway, this proves Nilakantha to have been two generations later than Mm. Mahesha Thakur and thus the period of 1595—1600 assigned to the birth of Mm. Harihara and Nilakantha is not unreasonable.

From a consideration of other synchronisms also described above, the same conclusion can be deduced and I think it futile to pursue them all. Assuming, therefore, that Harihara was born during the last decade of the 16th century and that he lived up to an age of, say, sixty-sixty-five, we come to the conclusion that he died sometime during the years 1655—1660 and this is exactly the conclusion to which the evidence of the two palm-leaf Mss. of this Shubhashita leads us. It can, therefore, be taken as almost settled that Mm. Harihara flourished in the first-half of the 17th century.

In view of what has been discussed above, it is very much to be regretted how scholars have erred about the age of Harihara. In his History of Sanskrit Drama, A. B. Keith assigns the composition of Bhartriharinirveda to the end of the 15th century when even Raghava, Harihara's father, was not born. As he does not give any evidence on the strength of which he came to this conclusion, nothing can be said about it except that it is inaccurate. Mm. Mukunda Jha Baksi in the introduction to his edition of the same Nataka places him in about 1650 Saka year i.e. the first half of the eighteenth century and relies for this on a tradition that Harihara was a contemporary of the great Mm. Gokulanatha Upadhyaya with whose cousin, Madana Upadhyaya, Harihara had a discussion about which even a verse is quoted. Both Kavishekhara Badarinatha Jha in his paper published in the Mithilanka of the Mithila-Mihira of Darbhanga and Mm. Dr. Umesha Mishra in the introduction to his edition of the Vidyakarasahaskaram rely perhaps on the same tradition and assign him to the 18th century. In view of the fact, however, that the Mss. of this Subhashita are available which were copied in the third quarter of the 17th century, the tradition making him a contemporary of Gokulanatha who was a contemporary of Maharaja Raghava Singha of Mithila and Raja Fateh Shah of Garhawala must be pronounced inaccurate and may be explained as referring to some other Harihara of which name there have been so many scholars in Mithila.

About the personal history of Mm. Harihara not much is known that is authentic. That he was a resident of the village of Bittho is quite certain. In all the Panjis he is styled a Mahamahopadhyaya by which term is meant, according to the definition given in the Panjis themselves, a scholar who was a master of all the schools of philosophy as distinguished from a mere Naiyayika who is called in the Panjis a Mahopadhyaya or a Mimamsaka who is termed a Mishra. But we do not know for certain who the Guru of Mm. Harihara was. We know, however, that he was the son by the second wife of his father, who married her in his old age and most probably died while Harihara and his brother were still very young. It is quite reasonable, therefore, to suppose that both the brothers were entrusted to the loving care of their maternal grand-father who was a scholar of great renown, a Mahamahopadhyaya, to whom Harihara makes feeling references. Very possibly, therefore, it was under him that both of them turned out to be great scholars, the elder one specialising in Philosophy and the younger in Astrology, but both of them imbibing the poetical talents of their grand-father for which Harihara praises him in preference even to his philosophical attainments.

It may be interesting to note here that Harihara and his brother changed the very atmosphere of their home at Bittho which became, thereafter, an important seat of learning. Their sons and grand-sons were all scholars of repute and even their step-brother's sons became imbued with a love of learning. More than anything else, it was poetry that was cultivated there and the Panjis record a number of poets among the descendants of Raghava Jha, the good, the credit for which must go to Harihara who should be regarded as the founder of the school.

There is, however, one thing about the scholarly attainment of our author which is worthy of note. In this Subhashita there are many forms which contravene Panini's rules of grammer and, are therefore, irregular. Such for example are (i) the disregard of एकशेप in नायकनायिकयो: in XI-1 and समासान्तविधि in काननपथा in X-65; (ii) the use of आशीर्लिङ in भूयात् in XI-76 and of शतृ with the root ईक्ष् in XII-22; and (iii) the forms कुलीनस्त्रिय: for कुलीनस्त्रिया: in X-54, कृन्तन for कर्त्तन in XII–49, आस for आसीत् or बभूव in XI–65, and प्रोष्यत्पतिका for प्रवत्स्यत्पतिका in the 10th chapter, though the last form has been so used even by Kaviraja Mahamahopadhyaya Bhanudutta in his famous Rasamanjari. One is, therefore, irresistibly drawn to the conclusion that Mm. Harihara was not a grammarian but that he was a philosopher by learning and poet by instinct.

HIS WORKS.

Besides the Subhashita there is only one work that can be said without any shadow of doubt to have been his composition, and that is the Prabhavatiparinayanataka which is still unpublished and a Ms. of which (No. 2395) has been described by R. L. Mitra on page 159 of the 7th volume of his Notices and also by Dr. K. P. Jayasval on page 88 of the 2nd Volume of the Descriptive catalogue of Mss. in Mithila, though without the verses of the prologue. This contains in the prologue (reproduced by R. L. Mitra) the very two verses that are the closing verses of this Subhashita with only this difference that in the drama the 3rd line of the second verse begins with "Govind-Sunu" which indicates that the drama deals with the life of Pradyumna, the son of Krishna. There is still another drama, attributed to him, Bhartriharinirveda, which has been twice printed, first from Bombay and then with a Sanskrit commentary and Hindi translation from Banaras and is very famous. But there is no indication in this work to prove conclusively that it is by the same Harihara who was the son of Raghava. Tradition, however, avers this to have been the work of the author of the Subhashita and is supported by the fact that we have in the Darbhanga Raj Library a palm-leaf Manuscript of this drama along with that of the Subhashita written by the same scribe on leaves of the same size which go unmistakably to show that both of them were transcribed together. It can, therefore, be taken for granted that this also is from his pen.

Mm. Mukand Jha Bakshi, in the introduction to his edition of the Bhartriharinirveda, states that there is also a smriti work of his called Dvaitanirnaya. Aufrecht also notes a Harihara on Dharma, who, he says, is quoted by Vachaspati Mishra in his Dvaitanirnaya and by Kamalakara in Nirnayasindhu. It is quite possible that that work on Dharma from which both Vachaspati and Kamalakara quote, was a Dvaitanirnaya as stated by Mm. Mukund Jha. But the very fact of his being quoted by Vachaspati rules it out that he was the son of Raghava Jha because we have already seen that the daughter's daughter of Raghava was married to the son of the grand-daughter of Vachaspati, who, therefore, must have been older than even Raghava Jha, Harihara's father by more than one generation. As stated repeatedly, there have been so many scholars of this name even in Mithila. There is actually one Harihara said to have been the Dharmadhyaksha (Chief Judge) at least 200 years before Vachaspati. There are other Hariharas also, many of them styled Mahamahopadhyaya and most of them preceded the great Vachaspati. Harihara, on Dharma, must have been, therefore, an earlier Harihara. The statement of Kavishekhara Badarinatha Jha, likewise, that Harihara wrote a commentary called Muktavali on a work of Devanatha Thakur is clearly by mistake as the verses he quotes are just the closing verses of this very Subhashita, which, I have already stated, was designed by the author to have been called "Suktimuktavali". As regards the different works noted under Harihara by Aufrecht or verses quoted under this name in the different Subhashita works, nothing can be said definitely. Some of them may have been the composition of our author but unless there is something to prove conclusively that they are by the same Harihara, who was the son of Raghava, we must not take them to be his and must be content with what is conclusively proved to have been his composition.

There are thus only three works—all Kavyas—on which the fame of our author rests and rests securely. Extolling the virtues of Kavya in the second chapter of this Subhashita, Harihara states that "a hundred different branches of learning may all be very charming but the fame resting on Kavya stands unimpeded". No work of Rameshvara has unfortunately survived for us to judge what kind of Kavya he composed or how unimpeded fame he achieved for that Kavya that Harihara cites as an example of his statement. But what he says about Rameshvara, whom, by the way, I identify with his maternal grand-father, has been proved in his own case. The distinguished title of Mahamahopadhyaya leads us to believe that he was indeed a "Nipita-Darshana-Grama"—"had drunk deep at the fountains of the different branches of Philosophy", but it is as a poet par excellence that he is remembered. The fame resting on his Kavyas is literally unimpeded and there is no doubt whatsoever that he will live down to posterity only as a great poet.

THE PRESENT WORK.

Whether we call the present work as the Suktimuktavali, by which name the author designates it in the closing verse, or simply as the Subhashita as it has been more commonly known and called in the colophon at the end of each chapter, it has to be admitted that the author designed it to be what is called in Sanskrita Literature a Subhashita work. A Sukti, Sadukti or Subhashita literally means "a good saying" but in Sanskrit Literature it is used in a special sense. A Subhashita in Sanskrit Literature, is a single verse, I should rather say, a single stanza, descriptive or didactic but complete in itself, expressing a single idea, devotional, ethical or erotic, in a witty or epigrammatic way. It is, thus, of the Muktaka type of poetry. Among Sanskrit scholars, Subhashitas have been very popular and that for two reasons. Free from all the restraints of a formal Kavya for which a sustained effort is necessary to maintain its high level, a Subhashita can be composed at any moment immediately an idea strikes the mind; and secondly, it can be easily remembered and can be cited equally easily with great effect on any appropriate occasion. Thus, there has hardly been a Sanskrit scholar with any taste and aptitude for poetry who has not composed a few of these Subhashitas. But the greatest misfortune with these Subhashitas has been that they were not put down in black and white by the authors themselves, but have all been transmitted from mouth to mouth. Efforts have been made by scholars from very early times to gather into anthologies as many of these floating verses as they knew or could collect. There is quite a good number of these anthologies, most of them in print also. Still it must be conceded that what these anthologies preserve cannot be more than a mere fraction of what must have been composed all over India. Nevertheless, they do preserve quite a large number, which too would have otherwise perished and thus keep the names of all those authors alive, whose only known works are these verses. These constitute the Subhashita literature

When we look into the many Subhashita anthologies we find that there are certain broad features characterising this type of literature. A Subhashita work is a collection of verses by different authors. There are the Gatha and Arya Saptashatis, the various Shatakas, the Bhamini-Vilasa and many other collections of Muktaka poetry from which verses are very often quoted in the different Subhashita works, but none of these works itself is called a Subhashita simply because they are all by one and the same poet. Secondly, the verses in a Subhashita work are never of one and the same Rasa and though any of the Rasas may preponderate in the collection, there must be verses of the other Rasas also to entitle the collection to be called a Subhashita. We have, for instance, the Padyavali of Rupa Gosvami which contains verses, like a true Subhashita, of different authors but it is not called a Subhashita because all the verses in this collection are devotional and no other Rasa is represented in it. Thirdly, and this follows naturally from what has been described above, a Subhashita work has no unity of stucture underlying it, the chapters or verses have no connection among them and the parts are not related to the whole as in a sequence. The only plan on which it is based is to collect verses on a single subject together under one head, and these heads are not knit together, howsoever loosely, nor have verses even under the same head any link connecting them.

Viewed in this light, the present work appears to be unique in its kind. Though the verses here are of all the different Rasas, on different subjects, devotional, ethical and erotic, yet they are all by one and the same author, Harihara himself. They are arranged under different chapters which like a true Subhashita do not appear on first sight to have any link connecting them but on a closer analysis it becomes evident that there is an inherent unity underlying the whole work which is not a mere collection of Subhashita verses composed at random without any connection among them, but has a definite purpose behind the whole plan. In order to make the plan with the purpose behind it clear, let me give a brief analysis of the contents

The first chapter which is called "Benedictory" is of the true Subhashita type and invokes the blessings of the different gods and goddesses of the Hindu pantheon including the ten incarnations of Vishnu and the eight forms of Shiva.

The second chapter called "Training of the child" opens with the praises of Kavya and the great Kavis of Sanskrit Literature. It, then, passes on to the virtues of a good wife and the pleasures of having a son. But the birth of a son by itself is not the great desideratum, says, Harihara; he must be properly trained in learning and discipline. The rest of the chapter is addressed to the father on the necessity and methods of training a child.

The third chapter is called "The Friendly Advice" and is addressed to the young student. It praises learning and discipline, characterises the evil men whose company the stripling youth is advised to avoid and the good men whose society he is encouraged to cultivate; and is full of such other wholesome precepts as may conduce to make his career successful and life happy.

It is, however, the fourth chapter that reveals at once the central theme of the work and is called "Living away from home". It opens with the statement that wealth alone makes the life of a person successful here on earth and praises, therefore, riches and deprecates poverty. But to be truly enjoyable that wealth, says Harihara, must be earned by one's own efforts which must be in true keeping with the dignity of the caste to which he belongs The only dignified way in which a Brahmana can get riches is to receive them in gifts, and, therefore, he must make efforts to find out a liberal patron and please him. With this end in view he should leave home and move about in foreign lands. Travelling, then, is praised and its risks and pleasures are described. The rest of the chapter contains practical hints to guide him at every step from his leaving home till he is presented to a king by some one among his favourite courtiers whom he must please before he makes an attempt to approach the king.

In order to please him the king must be praised and the whole of the 5th chapter, called the "Eulogy of the King", contains verses in different metres, most of them long ones, all in the praise of the king with which he should address the king as occasion arises.

The sixth chapter is called "Waiting upon the King" and is full of practical advice to guide him as long as he remains at the court, attending upon the king. It concludes with the essence of all the advice that "one should wait upon a king who is capable of giving riches and every effort must be made to please him by Shastric discussions, dissertation of religious truths, disquisition on moral maxims, or by sweet poems suitable to the occasions that present themselves".

The seventh chapter called "Political" is an elaborate dissertation on political truths likely to help him in dealing with the king and the court.

The eighth chapter is called the "Description of the Time". It opens with the statement that the king is often pleased with a fine description of the season or of the day and one should, therefore, try to please him with such descriptions. Then follow the descriptions of the six seasons, the sun-rise, the sun-set, the darkness of the night, the rising of the moon, and the star-lit sky, all in different metres.

The ninth chapter is devoted wholly to Erotics. It opens with the statement that the rich have a natural predilection for erotics and therefore, in the court of the king such verses should be recited. Then follow erotic verses in different metres.

The tenth chapter is in continuation of the ninth and describes the various types of Nayakas and Nayikas so very important in Sanskrit erotics and also rhetorics.

The eleventh chapter, called "Miscellaneous", contains all sorts of verses in different metres on subject devotional, moral or erotic on the true Subhashita pattern. These verses are introduced for being recited in the court of the king with a view to win the good will of the courtiers.

The twelfth chapter, which is the last, reverts to the central theme and guides the Pandita back to his home with whatever gifts he should have received. If he is not satisfied with one king, he is advised to seek the patronage of another; if his ambition is not fulfilled in one trip, he is counselled to undertake another; but staying out for long at one time is not recommended. Then follows a long discourse on the right use of riches to show how best to utilise the wealth thus earned. After a few more hints about the way in which the rest of his life should be spent, the chapter concludes with the exaltation of the contemplative life leading to self-realisation through the practice of mental equipoise (so very eloquently propounded in the Bhagavadgita) after which he is advised to strive. This is the highest truth, says Harihara, and after this the chapter has been named.

Even from this brief analysis it must be evident that though cast in the form of a Subhashita, this work has been planned as a complete whole with a definite purpose. namely, to serve as a practical guide to the Brahmana Pandita. For every period of his life from infancy up to his old age, there has been chalked out the right course of conduct which evidently was sanctioned by usage; for every stage of his life, a set of instructions has been offered which have obviously for their basis the experience of the successive generations of Panditas. The greater portion of the book, however, deals with the journeyings of the Pandita in search of a liberal patron and the various ways of pleasing him. From the moment the Pandita leaves his home till he returns to it, there is practically no step for which Harihara has no guidance to offer. There can hardly be an occasion in his journeys abroad or during his sojourn at the court of a king for which Harihara has not given his advice for regulating his behaviour. So detailed, indeed, are these instructions that one feels that the main purpose of compiling this work was to provide a hand-book of practical guidance for the benefit of such adventurous and ambitious Panditas. We can very aptly characterise this book as the Itinerant Pandita's Vade Mecum.

Apart, therefore, from its poetical excellences, the work has an historical interest which is a unique feature of this book. It portrays in a vivid manner the social life of the Brahmanas of Mithila during the 16th and 17th centuries, presents an ideal picture of the life of a Maithila Pandita of those days, and throws a flood of light on the ideals of the age. Indeed, there is no work in Sanskrit which reflects so vividly, yet so faithfully, the contemporary life of Maithila Society. This can, however, be seen in the clearest perspective in the light of the historical background and let us, therefore, have a peep at the conditions prevailing in Mithila during the centuries preceding the composition of this small though unique work.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND.

It is well-known that Mithila was the last Hindu kingdom in the whole of Aryavarta to fall a prey to the devastating inroads of the Mohammadon conquerors. For more than a century after the whole of northern India had passed into the hands of the Mohammadon rulers, she was secure under the Karnata Kshatriyas who had been ruling here since the close of the eleventh century and was, thus, free from the desecration and sacrilege of a Mohammadon invasion. Even after the sack of Sakuri, the then capital of Mithila by the army of Ghyasuddin Tughalak and flight of Maharaja Harisimhadeva northward towards the Nepal hills, Mithila was but temporarily under Mohammadon rule. The leaders of Maithila Society headed by Bhogishvara Thakura, the eldest son of Siddha Kameshvara Thakura, who was the Purohita of the Karnata Kshatriyas managed to approach Emperor Ferozeshah Tughalak, who was immensely pleased with them and, in the words of Vidyapati Thakura recorded in his historical poem, Kirtilata, honoured them by calling their leader, Bhogisha Raya his friend, whom he placed on the throne of Mithila as an ally. After the downfall of the Kshatriya rule, Mithila thus passed into the hands of the native Brahmanas.

Already under the Karnata Kshatriyas, Mithila was surging with a great intellectual fervour. Secure in the peace and prosperity under the protection and patronage of the benign Karnatas, Mithila produced some of the greatest celebrities in the annals of Indian scholarship whose contributions to Hindu Philosophy and Hindu Jurisprudence have not only made them immortal for all times but have at the same time shed a lustre on the fair name of Mithila. Such, for instance, were Udayana, Gangesha, Varddhamana, Lakhmidhara and Chandeshvara, among many others. They were all the products of the Karnata period of Mithila's history.

But early in the 14th century it became apparent to the leaders of Maithila society that they could not put off a Mohammadon conquest of the land for long. They saw that with the Mohammadons all around as the ruling race, it was impossible to escape from constant contact with them. In order, therefore, to keep unsullied their ancient culture, maintain untarnished the pristine purity of their race and above all, to keep undiminished the brilliant glow of their intellectual luminosity, they put their heads together to think out a plan how best to ward off the evil, looming large before them. They decided, therefore, to put their own house in order, and with that end in view, to re-organise the society thoroughly and radically on such firm foundations that no contact with the Mohammadons, not even their conquest of the land, might influence their course of life, and materially affect their society and religion. This was the social organisation, named after Maharaja Harisimhadeva, the crowning act of which was the Panji-prabandha, which was finally promulgated in the year 1248 of the Sake Era.

This new social reconstruction constitutes an important landmark in the history of Mithila. It was primarily a measure of social re-organisation designed to conserve the purity of the Maithila race and to uphold the distinctive characteristics of Maithila culture, but it set up such new standards of social values that in effect it revolutionised the entire outlook of society and shaped the future destiny of Mithila in such a manner and to such an extent that even the 20th century is not yet free from its influences. The reason of this is quite obvious. The leaders of society who had a hand in the shaping of this measure were the same who obtained the Raj of Tirhut for one of themselves and quite naturally, therefore, the ideals with which in view this measure was effected, received, under the Shrotriya rules of Mithila, a tremendous fillip and the measure itself got so strongly stabilised that it has weathered, in course of six hundred years and more, all the storms that have blown over Mithila without its roots being shaken, much less uprooted.

It has already been stated that under this new measure of social re-organisation the same importance was given to the cultivation of learning as to purity of lineage and piety of behaviour for a position in society. One's birth, however, is never in one's control and piety of behaviour is too personal a matter to admit of an effective test. The most practical plank, therefore, on the new platform was the cultivation of learning which is evidently in one's own hand and which can very well be judged by the society at large. Mithila, moreover, had been since times immemorial a land dedicated to learning. The tradition of glorious scholarship was still unbroken. To this a strong impetus was given by this new measure. With society so well organised and political freedom conferred by the Emperor of Delhi which was later on supported by the Shurky Nawabs of Jaunpur, who became, on the weakening of the imperial power of Delhi, the paramount rulers of the regions to the east of the Imperial city, Mithila under her native Brahmana rulers embarked upon an age of unbroken peace and plenty that led to intense intellectual activity which was the distinctive characteristic of the new regime. Never was Mithila barren of intellectual luminaries, and cultivation of learning was never neglected here but under the new regime it began to be cultivated with unprecedented zeal and devotion. In fact, it came to be regarded as the only honourable profession for a Brahmana to pursue if he had to retain his position in society, to neglect which would entail a loss of social status, but to excel in which would raise him and his family in the estimation of society. No wonder, therefore, that on an invitation issued by Maharaja Bhairava Simha Harinarayana during the latter part of the 15th century there was an assemblage of Panditas from all over Mithila among whom there were as many as 1,400 Mimamsakas only, and a little earlier, the great Shankara Mishra in his mature work, Upaskara, on the Vaishesika Sutras, claims more than a thousand pupils for himself alone. Truly has the late Dr. K. P. Jayaswal said that "in the 15th century Mithila under the Shrotriya Brahmans became the centre of Sanskrit learning in the East of India," and that "in the 16th century Mithila emerges as the acknowledged head both secular and religious of all the regions to the north (east?) of the river Sarayu" (Introduction to Mithila Mss. Volume I.pp. VIII) This was indeed the golden age of Maithila Scholarship!

It is quite true that learning was then cultivated as a part of the Brahmana's duty and not as a means to an end as now. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that the question of livelihood must have been as keen then as now. How did all those Panditas maintain themselves? What was the means of their livelihood? It is interesting to note in this connection that there was one very important thing that had no place in the new social order and that was wealth. Not that there were no rich Brahmanas among the high class Maithilas even at that time, but wealth was considered of no consequence whatsoever in estimating the social status of a Brahmana. Birth, accomplishments and character were the only factors which decided that issue and if a Brahmana had them, he was given a high position in society even if he was poor, but without them he was relegated to an inferior place and no amount of riches could help him to attain the privileged position. Brahmanas, it is well-known, have at no time attached great importance to riches and under the new scheme of things also the same traditional dignity of contented poverty was brought to the forefront once again and emphasised with new zeal. The ideal of perfection among the Maithila Brahmanas under the new order, the perfect Shrotriya in the reorganised society, has been Mm. Bhavanatha Mishra of Sarisaba, who is reputed to have never accepted even a gift, much less asked for it, as a mark of respect for which he came to be known as Ayachi by which name he is remembered with reverence by posterity.

This was, however, the ideal of perfection beyond the reach of an ordinary individual. Riches might not have had any value in the eyes of the society; they might not have enhanced one's social status; but riches have, at all times, been attractive and tempting for ordinary mortals, and placed manifold advantages in the hands of the possessors, thereof. It is, therefore, too much to expect that all these Panditas were fired with the same lofty idealism as Ayachi Bhavanatha, who spurned all riches and was content to live the simple life of a Shrotriya in the old Rishi-way. He has been unique during all these centuries, and there has not been another to equal him in this idealistic contentment. Among the rest there must have been persons with varying degrees of contentment, but it can safely be assumed that there were many Panditas, not only among the rank and file but even among the high class Brahmanas, for whom material prosperity had an attraction. On the subject of the right use of riches, Harihara has in this very work (XII-25) cited the example of Vateshvara, the maternal grand-father of the self-same Ayachi and one of the highest among the Maithila Brahmanas, who was renowned not only for his learning but riches also.

It is, thus, clear that possession of riches by itself was not banned by the society; much depended on the way in which the riches were acquired. The Hindu Shastras have laid down in great detail the professions that each Varna ought to follow. For a Brahmana there are certain professsions that are prohibited out-right, while others are neither prohibited nor approved, and there are only a few which are openly recommended. Following faithfully these distinctions between one profession and another, the society adjudged the position of a Maithila Brahmana and only those were given the high places who followed the approved professions. This was one of the chief criteria—indeed the most practical one—in deciding the piety of behaviour which was one of the three ingredients necessary for a privileged position in society under the new social organisation.

We know that there are six,—only six,—professions approved for a Brahmana and among them there are only three that can bring any riches, namely, teaching, officiating as a priest in a regular Yajna, and receiving them in gift. Teaching was the one profession that was most widely followed throughout Mithila but teaching for remuneration is strictly prohibited and was not practised any where in India, much less in Mithila, till very recently. Yajnas too had fallen into disuse during the period of Buddhist ascendancy and what little remained of it was appropriated mostly by Vaidikas, the Vedic scholars. Paurohitya, i.e. ordinary priesthood was remunerative, and though it was not considered as fully approved a profession as Yajana or officiating as a priest in a Yajna, it was followed very widely; but this also was technical in the sense that they alone could follow the profession of a Purohita, who had made a special study of the ritualistic literature and specialised in it. There was left, thus, only one way of acquiring riches which was approved by the Shastras for a Brahmana and that was receiving them in gift. This too, has been, however, hedged with many conditions. One has to decide before he accepts a gift if the maker of the gift is a proper person from whom the gift ought to be accepted, and this is why a puritan like Ayachi had made it a rule of his life not to accept any gift whatsoever. Nevertheless, it was an approved way of acquiring riches, and the only one which a Brahmana could follow conscientiously without violating the injunctions of the Shastras and suffering the opprobrium of society. Indeed, this Dana or gift became as popular in post-Harisinghadeva Mithila as Yajnas had been in pre-Buddhist India, and the numerous treatises written upon the subject bear testimony to the fact that this was the main source of income for all the Brahmanas, and the only means of acquiring riches for the more conscientious and ortnodox among them.

It can be readily seen that for the offering of these Danas to be made to them, the Panditas had to move about. Stay-at-home scholars could not expect to receive any gifts though the more renowned among them did sometimes receive them even at their homes. Generally, the Panditas were moving about, and till about a hundred years ago, it was a practice among the Maithila Panditas to move out once a year and return home with riches sufficient to leave them free to devote themselves to the cultivation of learning throughout the year. But this was obviously for those whose only ambition in life was to keep body and soul together. The more ambitious among them, for whom material prosperity had an attraction, moved about more extensively in search of a liberal patron. The more ambitious a Pandita, the longer he stayed out and the farther he went. In fact, the one great concern of the life of such ambitious Panditas was to find out a liberal patron who would satisfy their ambition.

The Shrotriya rulers of Mithila were great patrons of scholars and so were the rich persons among the Maithilas themselves who could afford to be generous. But it was impossible for them to satisfy the ambition of all these Panditas. The more ambitious among them were, therefore, going out even earlier, but by the end of the 15th century when the Oinabara dynasty of the Brahmana rulers of Mithila began to decay, (which about the year 1530 finally fell before the onslaught of the Mohammadon Nawab of Bengal,; the Panditas of Mithila were deprived of their native patronage and all of them for whom material prosperity had any attraction, went out for adventure and undertook perilous journeys to distant lands on the look-out of a liberal patron. The reputation of the Maithila scholars had spread far and wide. In his comical drama, Gauri-digambara Prahasana, the great Shankara Mishra claims for his father, Ayachi Bhavanatha, a band of scholar pupils, who were spread all over Aryavarta from one sea to the other, trading, as he says, in the wares of knowledge. Brilliant and witty, of erudite learning and exemplary character, these Panditas were respected wherever they went, and though most of them came back home, laden with riches sufficient to last them through their lives, or grants of land which their descendants still enjoy, some of them settled down permanently in those far off regions. There are, thus, colonies of Maithila Brahmanas all over India, in Bengal and Assam, in the Central Provinces and Rajputana, in distant Kashmir also, not to mention the United Provinces and Nepal; and if a history of all these colonies is compiled, it will be found that each one of them was founded by some adventurous and ambitious Pandita who could please some prince and thus receive from him a lavish gift, perhaps the very Guru-ship of the royal family, content with which he gave up all idea of returning home and settled down there.

It is beyond the scope of this introduction to describe even cursorily the exploits of all these Panditas. To do full justice to the subject, much patient and laborious research is required, which will form a glorious chapter when a comprehensive history of Mithila is written. Let me give here a few typical instances just to illustrate what has been described above. There was the renowned Govinda Thakur, author of the famous Kavyapradipa, who had as his patron one Bhavananda Raya, whom some scholars identify with the founder of Krishnanagar Raj of Bengal, though I have grave doubts about it. Whoever he might have been, the descendants of the eldest son of this Govinda Thakur are settled in the district of Dinajpur in Bengal and are in a flourishing state. There was Kaviraja Bhanu- datta, author of Rasamanjari, etc., who was the great-grandson of Ayachi Bhavanatha himself. He toured extensively in Central India attending the Courts of and eulogising Raja Sangram Shah of Garha Mandla, the Baghela prince Virabhana of Bandogarh the then capital of the state now known as Rewa, King Nizam Shah of Ahmadnagar, King Krishnadeva Raya of Vijayanagar, and lastly the famous Sher Shah. Gangananda called Kavindra, who was the son of the daughter of Kaviraja Bhanudatta's son, went as far as Bikaner and composed a work which he called Karnabhushana after the name of his patron king Karna of Bikaner. The renowned Mm. Gokulanatha Upadhyaya, with his brother Mm. Jagannatha, secured patronage of king Fateha Shah of Garhwal. Towards the end of the 18th century there was the famous Bhavaninatha, popularly known as Sachala Mishra, who went to distant Poona to the Court of the then Peshwa, Madhava Rao Narayan, from whom he received the grant of two villages in the district of Jubbulpore, still in possession of his descendants, and is reputed to have won along with this grant "the high honour of having his Palki carried by the Peshwa on his own shoulder, an honour which was reserved only for the very select Panditas, which was very rarely bestowed". But the most noteworthy of all is the instance of the founder of the present Darbhanga Raj, Mm. Maharaja Mahesha Thakur. His elder brother Mm. Damodar Thakur was the Purohita of king Sangram Shah of Garha Mandla and his descendants were settled for many generations in the city of Mahishmati, recorded by one of his descendants Mm. Premanidhi in his Dharmadharmaprabodhini. Mm. Mahesha was at first a courtier of Rani Durgavati, the daughter-in-law of Raja Sangram Shah. From there he went to Delhi and secured the grant of the Raj of Tirhut from Emperor Akbar, who was pleased with his vast learning and scholarship and bestowed upon him, the Raj ruled for so long by learned Brahmanas. No other instance is available in the history of India, where learning has so signally been rewarded, where a Pandita has won by dint of his scholarship what others win by the prowess of their arms. It is, indeed, to the credit of the holy land of Mithila, where Bhudevas have been Bhupalas for more than 600 years to have shown to the world that cultivation of learning can bear fruits in peace as sweet and everlasting as any war can win with all its attending inhumanities.

Such was the state of society that has so graphically been pictured in this unique work by Harihara, which was composed for the guidance of ambitious and adventurous Panditas. The search for a liberal patron must have been very keen during those days as the finding of an employment is keen now-a-days for graduates leaving a University—the one great problem before them, and though I have mentioned here only half a dozen names at random, there have been thousands of scholars, who made their living on the charity of the rich. The maintenance of learned men was, during those days, a responsibility of the rich men in society, and nourished under their munificence, the scholars of Mithila devoted themselves exclusively to the cultivation of learning, which reached its zenith during the hundred years before Harihara's time. The brightest product of the age, the one indeed in whom the entire spirit of the age was symbolised, was the great Mm. Maharaja Mahesha Thakur.

In one respect, however, Mm. Harihara deviates from the high ideals of the Maithila society, and that is about the possession of riches. Himself a Shrotriya, Mm. Harihara writes this work from the point of view of persons who were born in families possessing कुल, शील, श्रुत and आचार (chapter II, verse 29), meaning in one word, Shrotriyas. Again and again, he stresses the importance of such a high birth. That the only means of acquiring riches for such a high-born-learned Maithila Brahmana was by receiving them in gift has been made clear in the tenth verse of the fourth chapter. But about the possession of riches, Harihara presents advanced views. He states categorically that riches alone make the life of a man successful here on earth. This gives an importance to riches which seems somewhat unusual for a society that idealised contented poverty and we can, therefore, say with some plausibility that what Harihara states here was not the general view of the society but his personal opinion or at best, the opinion of that section of society for whom he composed the work, namely, the ambitious and adventurous Panditas for whom, riches, indeed, constituted a major, if not the major, success in life.

But it must be conceded that the general view of the society also had undergone considerable change in this respect during the three centuries that had elapsed since it had been newly re-organised. As days passed, the fervour with which the high ideals set up before the society were cherished gradually waned. Materialism was ganing ground, and under its influence the puritanic indifference with which wealth was formerly looked upon was giving place to love of riches which is innate in man. To illustrate this liberal trend in the outlook of the society, I cannot do better than cite two well-known facts.

In the middle of the 14th century when the sons of Siddha Kameshvara Thakur accepted the Raj of Tirhut, they gradually fell from grace in the eyes of the society and though their family was one of the highest among the Maithilas, every high born Maithila, thereafter, shunned matrimonial alliances with them till at last the Oinabars, so they were called, sank down deep in the social hierarchy. Towards the close of the 16th century, however, the same Raj of Tirhut was acquired by Mm. Maharaja Mahesha Thakur, who was a Shrotriya of the Khandabala family, but this family did not suffer any diminution in social status on account of the acceptance of the Raj. On the contrary these Khandabalas received an added lustre on account of the new acquisition, and every high family felt itself honoured by having a matrimonical alliance with them till by the end of the 18th century the leadership of the entire Maithila society was entrusted to the then Mithilesha, who has since then been dispensing social status on the entire community of Maithila Brahmanas as the Head of the Society, the highest among all Maithilas. Similarly, Kaviraja Bhanudatta the great-grand-son of that ideal of perfection among all Maithila Brahmanas, the perfect Shrotriya, Ayachi Bhavanatha, it has already been stated, went from one court to another, eulogising the princes, Hindus and Mohammedons alike, seeking their patronage, and we know that he did not lose his status in society on that account but continued a Shrotriya that he was born. These two cases will suffice to indicate that riches were not looked upon with indifference during the age in which Harihara flourished and for which he composed this work; they were, rather, considered of great consequence even by the high born and learned Maithilas provided they were properly got and it is this growing materialism that had come to stay in the Maithila Society, which has been reflected by Mm. Harihara so very faithfully in this work.

* * * *

Another fact of some historical importance with this Subhashita is the little details about the lives of certain distinguished Maithilas cited by Mm. Harihara as illustrations of some of his statements in the second and the last chapters. They must have been well-known during his time so as to serve as examples but to us, these are empty names and we cannot satisfactorily identify them. Still I have identified two of them, Rameshvara (II-22) with the author's maternal grand-father and Vateshvara (XII-24) with the maternal grand-father of Ayachi Bhavanatha, because these are famous names. There is, however, one name, Mahadeva Thakur, (XII-6) whom I identify with the eldest brother of Mm. Maharaja Mahesha Thakur. He was a Mahamahopadhyaya like his three younger brothers, and was popularly known as Thegha Thakur. Nothing, however, was known about him and the mystery has been solved by the statement of Mm. Harihara (XII-26) that he left home with the vow that he would return only with a lac of rupees but he did not return at all probably because his vow was never fulfilled. Harinath (XII-14) may likewise be the famous author of Smritisara but one cannot be sure about it as with other names. Nevertheless, petty though these details are and the names sometimes unidentified, they have an historical interest which may throw light on many a dark corner of Mithila's unexplored history.

POETICAL EXCELLENCES.

The historical element in this Subhashita is not, however, of primary importance. It is altogether a new thing and an attempt has been made for the first time by me to read this into it. Quite independent of this historical interest, the work has been popular among lovers of Sanskrit poetry. Published more than half a century ago, it has passed through a second edition, and with all the imperfections of the published text, it has afforded pleasure to quite a large number of learned readers. But it is as a piece of poetical composition that this work has been received so long, and has been read with delight solely for its poetical excellences. These excellences are, however, manifest and have been recognised and appreciated by all the connoisseurs of poetical art. I need not, therefore, dwell upon them at any great length, but shall content myself with indicating briefly, without going into details, some of those characteristic features of the poetry of this Subhashita, which appear to me to constitute its excellences.

For a proper appreciation of the poetry of this Subhashita it is, however, profitable to note that there are two distinct kinds of poetry in this work, which will be apparent even from the brief analysis of the contents of the work given above. We know from the last verse of this Subhashita that this was composed by Mm. Harihara for the sake of his younger brother and the whole work is, thus, addressed to him, and through him, to the wider circle of ambitious Panditas. Naturally, therefore, the poet assumes the role of a confidential adviser of superior wisdom and knowledge, with more varied experiences of life, and as such, pours forth with great confidence his counsels of perfection in the most persuasive manner to the younger generation of Panditas just on the threshold of life. There are thus six chapters (excluding the opening one which is purely benedictory and has not, therefore, to do anything with the general plan of the work) where the poet speaks directly to his readers. Each one of these chapters has verses in a single metre, short and simple, Anustubh in two and Arya in four. The poetry of these chapters is natural, direct, perspicuous, and didactic. The other five chapters contain verses, in different metres, mostly long and involved ones, given as specimens of the kinds of verses that the Panditas should recite before the king on suitable occasions with a view to winning his favour. The poetry of these chapters is highly imaginative and ornate but ostentatious and therefore, artificial. This work is, thus, a delightful blend of both these types of poetry, belonging to two different planes and while the second displays the poetical carftsmanship of our poet, it is through the first that the originality of his poetical talents really shines forth.

But the one quality, which runs throughout the entire work is the mellifluous rhythm of its verses. It is sweet melodiousness that characterises the poetry of this Subhashita. This is effected by the frequent use of apt alliterations and clever chimes which are so very charming to the ears. There is hardly a verse in this Subhashita which is devoid of this embellishment. In order to make this possible it is essential that the words used should be carefully selected so as to give not only the appropriate sense but the proper sound also, and naturally, therefore, in a work abounding so much with alliterations and chimes, the diction is apt to become uncommon, laboured and even obscure. But so very dexterous is our poet and so complete is his mastery over Sanskrit vocabulary, that he manipulates all these alliterations and chimes without sacrificing the perspicuity and naturalness of his composition. There are words and forms in this Subhashita also which are not quite common and have apparently been selected for the sake of sound only, but they are few and far between, and our author never allows the effectiveness of the sense of the verses to suffer though he is sometimes led away by his partiality for the sound of the words. Even where no alliteration is intended our poet generally chooses words that are soft and sweet, but at the same time, clear and not quite uncommon. This sweetness of diction, therefore, is an outstanding merit of the poetry of this Subhashita and as this is achieved without any loss to lucidity, propriety, force, or suggestiveness of the sense, it becomes an artistic feature that imparts such an uncommon excellence to the poetry of this work.

The didactic portion of this work is, moreover, original in conception and brilliant in execution. We have already seen how this work has been planned with a purpose behind it, and such a work, which contains only advice, instructions and guidance is apt to become dull, insipid and monotonous. But so very sincere is our poet in his purpose, so very much persuasive in tone, so full of confidence about the perfection of his counsels, that his discourse is uniformly lively and interesting and his words have an irresistible appeal. His method of approach is sympathetic and helpful; his manner of presentation is direct and unpretentious; and the examples and illustrations which enliven the discourse, are so very much pointed and apposite that they are quite telling in their effects, and give to his words a force which never fails to strike and impress. Even when he deals with the most minute and common-place details, he is not boring. The wealth of details is, rather, a distinctive feature of this portion of the work, and they throw sidelights on the state of society in such a manner that the picture becomes vivid and attractive. The style, above all, is suited eminently for the purpose. It is simple and natural, and though it is not devoid of poetic embellishments, they are manipulated so very subtly and unostentatiously that they help to render the language elegant and refined without making it showy or pedantic. All these combine to give to his portion of the work a freshness and brilliance which is hard to meet with in a work of this kind, imparts to it a grace and charm, which is exceptionally rare, and renders this work unique of its kind.

The other kind of poetry of this Subhashita, which I choose to call "Courtly" is by its very nature gaudy and ostentatious. We have already seen that these verses are introduced here to serve as specimens of the kinds of verses that a Pandita should recite in the court of a king, which must display, therefore, the learning and skill of the Pandita so as to impress the king with his attainments and abilities. Designed, therefore, as models of perfection for the younger Panditas to copy and emulate, these verses make a great display of the erudite learning and poetical craftsmanship of our author and are, at the same time, wonderfully faultless and excellent according to all canons of Sanskrit poetics. But the topics of these verses are just a few. Eulogy of a king, or the description of the seasons and the time, erotic verses of different aspects, and the description of the Nayikas in particular, are subjects well-known in Sanskrit literature; they are almost stereotyped and the literature upon them is vast indeed. It is, therefore, too much to expect that Harihara would say something new or original about them. They show, on the otherhand, quite unmistakably the influence of older literature on the subject, and to name only one, the influence of Rasaparijata of Kaviraja Bhanudatta is seen clearly over this Subhashita. while the whole of its tenth chapter is greatly indebted to and largely modelled upon the famous Rasamanjari of the same Kaviraja. But even when the ideas or imageries are the same as developed by older poets, the manner in which he presents them, and the language in which he puts them, are all his own, and, therefore, though he has to say very little that is absolutely new, the way in which he says those things is novel, indeed. In one respect, he is, however, quite original. No other poet has played upon the names of the different signs of the Zodiac in the same way as Harihara has done in his description of the six seasons.

But what it lacks in originality has been much more than recompensed by the boldness of conception, flights of imagination, richness and perfection of embellishments, appositeness of style and diction, and the variety of metres, with the result that the production is a brilliant work of art, sweet and charming, skillfully executed and lavishly decorated, a new work altogether though on old subjects. Just for these reasons, this portion lacks in that freshness and spontaneity which characterise the didactic portion of it, and there is a tinge of artificiality descernible throughout, though the verses in smaller metres even in this portion have much of that naturalness and grace which we miss so sadly in others. In points of polish and elegance, in what is called finish, the work is, however, uniformly splendid, and with so few blemishes and so many excellences, this work is, indeed, rare even in the vast field of Sanskrit literature.

Let me recall in this connection the words of late Dr. R. L. Mitra thrown casually in the midst of his notice of the Manuscript of this work (Notices Vol. V, P. 164, No. 1851), Very very rarely, indeed, does the learned Doctor express any opinion about the literary merit of the works noticed by him, but so very charmed was he by the excellences of this work that he goes out of his way in noticing this unique work and in one short sentence gives the quintessence of all critical appreciations of this Subhashita, the last word, indeed, on the subject. Let me, therefore, close this in the words of the late Dr. R. L. Mitra himself that "the poems of this Subhashita are of high merit".

Such is this exquisite work, small though unique, which I place before the lovers of Sanskrit language and literature in the hope that published in its complete form from some of the oldest and most reliable Mss. the text of this edition will be found much more perfect and genuine and will, therefore, be read with better appreciation and greater delight. Long and detailed, indeed, has this introduction been, but if it is found to have fixed with any precision the identity and age of our authors, and rendered any help in the better understanding of the work by throwing fresh light, however feeble, on the condition of the society for which the work was composed, and ideals of the age which have been enshrined for ever herein, I shall deem my labour amply repaid.

In the end I must offer my thanks to Mm. Dr. Umesha Mishra, whose statement, as stated at the very outset, led me to undertake this work. But if this undertaking has been successful, that success is due to the constant advice and helpful suggestions of Kavishekhara Pandita Badarinatha Jha, lately of the Dharmasamaja Sanskrit College of Muzaffarpur and his worthy disciple, Pandita Surendra Jha Suman, the Editor of the Mithilamihira of Darbhanga. But for their cordial assistance and encouragement, this would never have been what it is.

I must also acknowledge here the deep sense of my gratitude to Pandita Girindramohan Mishra, the Assistant Manager of Darbhanga Raj, who has been kind enough to go through the entire work in manuscript, and charmed by its excellences, arranged for its publication. And for its publication in such an excellent form, I must thank Pandita Upendra Acharya, the Manager of the "Indian Nation" of Patna, and his assistants, Pandita Dineshwar Jha and Pandita Kali Kant Jha. The proofs have been looked into by my friend Dr. Subhadra Jha Shastri but he is too close a friend of mine to require any thanks for that.

I only regret that for want of proper diacritic marks, this portion could not be made as perfect as I had liked it to be, but there was no help for that and I must apologise for the difficulty and confusion that may result for want of them.

P. S.

Since going to the Press I have come across another Manuscript of this work in the possession of Mahavaiyakarana Pandita Shri Dinabandhu Jha of Sarisaba Mahavidyalaya. This is a paper manuscript, excellently written but incomplete both in the beginning and at the end. It opens on the 16th folio with the middle of the second verse of the 4th chapter and ends on the 68th with 34th of the last chapter. It is, however, written fairly correctly and except for the mistakes in putting the Visargas properly and the right use of ण, it is without doubt as useful as the fragment of the Ms. ग. It is very important to note that this manuscript contains all the verses that are found in Mss. मा and ना, even the 50th verse of the 9th chapter, except only one, the 30th verse of the last chapter. I have noted down the readings of this manuscript also under the sign दो and it will be seen how very useful the find of this Ms. has been to decide the most suitable readings of the text. I only regret that the manuscript is incomplete so that it could not help me throughout the whole work, and it cannot be gathered who wrote this and when.
